

TITLE: Evolution of choice principles

Abstract: We consider a population of players where many games are randomly selected and players are randomly paired to play a game. Different types of players are present within the population. Each type represents a different choice principle, or choice rule, that outputs a strategy for any selected game. Then we look at the evolutionary dynamics in order to identify what types are evolutionary stable among all the types in the population.